Pearline has been through it, but it has "got there," Every other modern improvement has had the same struggle. There's unbelief, prejudice and mis inderstanding-peddlers of imitations—the fa se statements of soap makers and unscrupulous grocers to fight against. The old way is hard to leave, even if a better way is open. You can't believe that Pearline can do so much; then you can't believe that it's done safely; -in the end, you can't see how you ever did without it That's the story of millions-full of doubt at first, full of satisfaction at last. If you're at the doubtful stage, try it. You won't know easy washing and cleaning 'till you do.

The doctor and his assistants found the plate and the teeth in this woman's ocophagus, about two inches above the istometh. The curved plate fitted the pipe so well that there was no obstruction to the food as it passed down the throat, and the plate was already partity encysted by a growth of flesh over the edge of the heats!

The physicians believe it to be the only case of the kind on record.

Days Sarsarantla Co.

Gentlemen.—For over ten years I have been agreat sufferer with weakness peculiar to my sex. I would have for days at time a terrible bearing-down feeliar to my sex. I would have for days at a time a terrible bearing-down feeling, accompanied by great exhaustion and severe pain in back and limbs. I would go to bed fatigued, and rise in the morning more exhausted than wen I retired. Often after rising I would have a period of treinfolling, until at last my nerves were in a state of complete prostration. I would have little or no appelle. Almost Constant headsche, accompanied by strange sensations, etc. Such was my condition when I first heard of DANA'S SARSAPARILLA. Though I am, but forty-three years of age, yet my hair is gray, and I look like a person near sixty years old.

While visiting my danghter, Mrs. Hardy, in Bangor, Me., she permaded me to try a bottle of DANA'S SARSAPARILLA, and to please her I dld so. That bottle helped me a little. The second one gave me a good appetite, and caused me to rest better nights. I continued to use it, and continued to improve, till I had taken eleven bottles. And, realse God, I am WELL! I THAS CURED MR! I feel like a new person! I have increased in Seah from hinety-one pounds to a hundred and forty-its pounds, and enjoy life once more. Evidence from a Free Trade OHN H STONE, Recorder Organ.

He must be blind indeed who does not see that the high tariff in this country is doomed. The only possible way of saving the coming Presidential election to the party that has supported the high tariff is by abandoning it in the candidacy selected. In any event, the campaign, if not a campaign of disavowai, must be a campaign of disavowai, must be a campaign of apology. In the one count it will be the abando ament of the high tariff; in the other a confession of weakness. whice our abandous ment of the high fariff; in the other a confession of weakness which will prove a sure prelate to defeat.—Hoston Herald.

The above forms the closing partion of one of those ponderous editorials with which the Handd has been annihilating the tariff for a good many years. [CONTINUED.]

The house was completed in what seemed judged by our standards, a wonderfully short time for it was ready to be lived in before the end of the winter season of 1870—say in carnival time. Ent Harry Trent had himself superintended the work in all its stages, and had seen to it that the workmen's hours of rost did not exceed their hours of laof rest did not exceed their nours or each that it is that it is the rest and not exceed their nours or each that it is the rest and not exceed their nours or each that it is the rest and not exceed their nours or each their n that he was waiting for Olympia Raven and her mother to get ready, or, possi-bly—for all men have their weak side bly—for all men have their weak side— he was the least bit superstitious and was haunted by a recollection of that old proverh, "When the house is built death enters in." But he was strong and healthy, in the full enjoyment of a life that had never met with a serious failure or disappointment. In every-thing he attempted he had been successful, and either pridence or a naturally happy temperament had kept him from spoiling his nerves and digestion by too apxious and assiduous labor. If ever the afternoon slope of a man's life promised to be sunny, easy and prolonged, it promised so to him. He had built a house perfectly adapted to his needs: it was ready to receive him; his many friends, impatient for the house warming, were counting the days that had to elanse before Lent came and postponed colebration to a remote Easter and was the matter with him?

He had, in fact, visited the house almost every day, letting himself in with his passkey, and sauntering through the beautiful rooms, where fires were kept burning in the open grates by the care-takers in charge. He contemplated the interior from all points of view and in all moods, sometimes tentatively making a slight modification of arrangement, which he was as likely as not to restore the next day. He seemed leath to persuade hunself that all was really just as he would have it, and yet he could devise no improvement. So might a lover study the face of his mistress. afraid to believe that her lovely features were absolutely without flaw, or so night any neutal regard the most nearly perfect carthly achievement, mable to suggest any bettering of it, and yet vaguely conscious that, in some way, nothing of this earth could be perfect

The twenty-fifth of the month arrived and found the situation unchanged. Harry Trent had on that day gone to afternoon ten at Mrs. Matchin's, it being her day at home, and had remained till after six o'clock. A dozen other people were spresent, and the talk was lively. Harry lunself seemed in particularly fine spirits. When he took bis leave, Mrs. Matchin a companied him to the ante-room and stayed there a few moments spraking with him in an undertone. They were undenbiedly on confidential terms, and (for every straw must count; it sent up her stock as the possible Mrs. Trent several degrees. She came back with a despensel color and a mysterious smile, and entertained her company more brilliantly than ever.

Harry Trent walked to his club, only a few blocks off, where he temporarily had rooms, and took dinner there with two or three friends, one of whom was his chief clerk. The latter afterward drank coffee with him in the smoking roam. At about eight o'clock Trent left the chib without saying where he was going, and he did not come back that night. Let us follow him ourselves. A recent snell of warm, weather has inclued the snow from the streets, but now it has fallen clear and cold again. The dry, r a ing air tingles in the nostrils. Harry Trust throws away his eight and Ellshis lungs with the frosty distillation of the stars; then be buttons his confucross his chest and steps out at a sturdy piece. The white hair gisetens like silver beneath the rim of his silk hat, his ruddy, kindly, hatalsome face, with its aquiline nos blue eyes and well set lips, is alternately revealed and shadowed as he approaches and passes the street lamps. At the corner of Twenty-sixth street and Fifth avenue, where the up town Delmonico's now stands, he halts and seems to de-

A beggar creeps up and mumbles a petition. Harry looks at him a moment petition. Harry looks at him a moment and then draws off his glove to give him a huarter. A woman walks by him, hingers and turns to pass him again. Harry says, !Take care, my child; there's a policyman round the corner." A hack drawer draws up at the curb and trades the last. Harry haritestes. These touches his lat. Harry hesitates. There were no elevated roads in those days; but finally be shakes his head and continues his walk up the averue.

"It will done good to foot it," he says to himself. "What's a couple of miles." Softened light comes through the curtained windows on either side of the street; carriages rumble up and down over the uneven pavement, ever and anon pausing to set down their occupants at a carpeted doorway. At Thirty-sixth street Harry pauses again, and before his mind rises the picture of the young Olympa, a figure of youth, health and arch intelligence, who is even now, perhaps, thinking of him, only a few doors away. Shall he go in and pass the evening there: He nearly yields to the suggestion, and takes a step or two in that direction. But not he backpromised himself something different; he will see Olympia tomorrow. He turns again and resumes his walk. Yet Olympia was really thinking of him at that moment and tomorrow—well. Tomorrow some-titues means never.

No such reflection disturbs Harry Trent. The exercise has warmed his blood, and his heart is light. The constant success of his life has had its effect upon him. He does not believe that misupon lim. He does not believe that mis-fortune can overtake him. Mortal man seldom or never lives to Harry's age without having done something that he ought not to have done. Yet he has done much good in the world. His reputation among his fellows is untarhished. If he have enemier they have not declared themselves. But has he an enemy? At any rate, he fears none. Like other forturate men, he has faith in his star; like them, too, he forgets the legend of Cros-

By this time he has passed beyond the By this time he has passed beyond the most thickly settled portion of fashionable New York; the rumble of carriages is less frequent, and there are gaps between the houses. Foot passengers are few. His steady footsteps are echoed distinctly from the frozen pavement. His shadow only attends him as he walks, now lengthening behind, now slipping beneath his feet and starting out ahead of him. Darker shadows gather in the side streets. As he reaches gather in the side streets. As he reaches the park something seems to detach it-self from the duskiness on the left and move forward to where a broken boarding bespread with a gaudy placard an-nouncing the appearance of a favorite actrees in the tragic drams of "Leah" provides a convenient screen. Harry Trent passes steadily on and the shadow follows him.

And now, at length, the goal of the little journey is in sight. There stands the new house, solid and shapely on its strong foundations, built to hast and to be the abode of prosperity and happiness. As Harry Trent approaches it he alackens his pace, and a proud glow of proprietorship expands his hreast. He sees, as in a swift vision, the perspective of the years to come. Within these four wals is to begin the long succession of a happy posterity. Righ, powerful and peaceful, they shall take their place as the best type of the foremost nation of haspy possersy.

Trent, in spite of his proved and practical business sagacity, has a lively imagnation; and, as the miser steals off to count his money, or the lover to screenade his lady love, so had Harry become infatnated with the idea of spending an unsuspected night in his new house. I would not share with any other that gin experience, and it would be agreed in after years, amid the stir and voices of an overflowing family and social life, to look back upon this first night of soli-

With an inward smile of satisfaction accordingly, Harry Trent ascends the steps and puts his key into the lock. The door yields before him and swings on noiseless hinges, but as he closes it the hollow sound resounds through the darkness. Hercupon, presently, steps are heard in the distance and a light appears, carried in the hand of the faithful caretaker, who, with his wife, maintains guard in the basement. Strictly speaking, of course, Harry will not pass the night alone, nor, perhaps, can a man of his business and social importance ever hope to escape entirely from the knowledge and supervision of his fellows. It was possible that several persons might know of or suspect his present where-abouts. But, on the other hand, caretakers can hardly be said to count as oc cupants, and if a man believes his move ments to be untraced, he is just as con tent, for the time being, as though they

Destroying Weeds.

When the crops begin to break ground the weeds may also be looked for to be growing among them. Then is the season when they may be most easily killed. As soon as the rows can be seen, begin with the light, fine-toothed barrow in the helds and the garden rake in the smaller garden beds, to loosen the surface of the ground. The weeds that first start are those whose seeds lie near the surface, and they need but a little touch to tear up their roots and destroy them, while the seed that has been d or sown there lies deeper, and will not suffer. Then, too, the good farmer should put to seed enough to that it will do no triury, even if a few are killed, and the saving of labor in killing weeds with the harrow or rake that goes over the whole surface, among the plants as well as between the rows, is an important stem, while the stirring of the soil fits it to absorb all the fertilizing elements of the nir, the dew and the 'rainfall, and while we do not know how much such elements may contribute to the fertility of the land or the growth of the crop, we have reason to believe that they play no small part. The harrow is not meant to take the place of the horse hoe, or the garden rake, or the hand hoe, but to precede them for a few weeks at the early stages of the growth of the plants. | Corn may be harrowed over as well as potatoes and onlone, carrots and beets raked over as well as peas, to the great benefit of the crops, and the saving of labor in the destruction of weeds. Heep them anoning at short intervale, until the crops are too well grown to admit of their use, and then be as faithful with the cultivator and boe. Never let the weeds get large enough for the passerby to declare that the field needs hoeing, but kill them as soon as they can be seen. It is not only economy to do this, in preventleg them from robbing the soil of its fertility, but in keeping them from taking up also the moisture that is needed for the growth of the plant, and it is an economy of labor, for a field can be stirred over three times when it does not need hoeing, with much less labor than it can be once when it needs hoeing very hadly.

As the time comes for turning cows to pasture, do not forget that there is very tie notricion in young grass, and a cow that has been kept, up for several months. may very easily eat too much of it. Do nor drop off the grain feed too suddenly.

Sweet corn as a garden crop should be put in every week this month, and even up to the last of next month, that there may be some for family use and for market each week as long as it can be kept up. Often the later plantings sell at as high orices as the early. When a change is made from an early variety to a later sort, to his hald be planted at the same time, as the latter grows more slowly. Reans and peas should also be kept up in sneerssion in the same manner

While it is laudable and honest to hoy as chearly as possible we should not exsect to get stock for less than it is worth. Buy only from reliable nursirles and get their very best stock, and pay a fair price for it. By the best stock I do not mean the largest or oldest, but thrifty young stick; and in the case of small fruit, nothing but thrifty one year-old plants should be used.

A correspondent of the Country Gentlen an enjs that his barns are so arranged erappa a lo sufficient bencontras of a which is open to the south. It is profitable as an exercise ground for the cattle without exposing them to inclement weather, and is also a veitable manure factory. In the summer it is convenient for storing wagons and tools; he has also saved many dollars in having a place to run in loads of hay or grain when caught by a sudden shower: all the wagons were run in there without stopping to unload.

Cabbage seed for a late crop may be sown on rich soil made into beds and finely pulverized any time in May. Keep the weeds out of the cabbage by running a narrow hoe between the rows, and if the cabbage plants crowd each other, thin and transplant into another bed. If cabbages are transplanted two or three times before being set out in the field, the plants will be stocky, and have enough fine roots so that transplanting will scarcely check their both before and after planting, are so superior to what they used to be that a farmer is inexcusable who plants on poorly fi ted ground. The idea that, though prostly prepared at first, the lack can be up by extra cultivation afterwards, is a serious mistake. In any hoed eron the most effective cultivation to insure rapid growth is that done before planting. A good send-off goes for towards securing a good crop, for if the conce start quickly they can suon reach down and laterally to a much wider extent than when stunted at first. for planting. Our better natures continually crave something that is better. They are in close sympathy with the law of progress which demands constant action. No farmer should be content with present attainments in any line of work, because the outside possibility has not been reached, and so with the grange. No matter how grand the past has been, the future is before a with the demand for nobler and better work as the weeks and months roll

The next session of the Knox and Lincoln Union Pomona grange will be held with May 22d, at 1 o'clock P. M., if stormy, one

A realty good farmer atmost necessarily improves whatever land he works. In England or even in Ireland the laws are made so that they give the tenant a part at least of the value that he has added to the farm during his lease of the premises. Herr, if a tenant makes the farm better, it may prove his lejury by raising the rent. But so many farmers who own their land only do it to decrease fertility that they have realty little advantage over those who own farms, and lease them for a fixed price or to be worked on shares.
